THE OPEN SCIENCE AND RESEARCH MOVEMENT

The open science and research movement has been shaping the world of scholarly communication for a few years now. As a part of this initiative, an evaluation of the openness of research organizations was completed. The first evaluation indicated that OSR functions needed clearer guidelines and a coordinating unit to further improve the cultural maturity of OS. Furthermore, the scholarly publishing activities also needed a new home base due to organizational changes. As the information and library services had the basic understanding of scholarly publishing, different publishing channels and responsible conduct of research, it was decided that the library takes on these responsibilities. For the new challenges, the traditional information specialist skills set needed updating. These new skills were immediately put to use by creating a new open access publishing platform, organizing workshops and lectures for the staff and creating organizational guidelines for open Research Development and Innovation (RDI) practices. As for the role of the information specialists, the new role as OSR experts has opened up new possibilities within the organization. They are now seen more as possible partners in different activities, participating in project work and further developing the way openness is being carried out in all aspects of RDI and teaching.
